When and how did you start making art?

I've always been making art on and off. I find it impossible to sit still, so art was a way of keeping me busy and quiet during the day and using my imagination. However, in college I was able to develop a passion and love for wheel-throwing ceramics and I was able to produce some work that shaped me and helped me continue the rest of my college career and to begin my current career as a production potter at Sunset Hill Stoneware.

How would you describe Green Bay/northeast Wisconsin's arts community?

The artistic community in Green Bay and the Fox Cities has seen some incredible support throughout the past few years which is very exciting to see and something

I always grew up hoping to see and be a part of. The community of gallery owners and artistic residents in Green Bay are talented, respectful and kind, and they really helped me to find my passion and my art. It is really cool to see all the murals and public art pieces that are being funded in downtown Green Bay, De Pere and Appleton. I expect to see it continue to grow into a bigger and more beautiful community of individuals and I am excited to hopefully have my art included within those ranks.

What inspires your work?

I take influences from Korean pottery and American folk forms, but I am inspired by form, balance, personality and improvement — and Type 1 Diabetes. This is something that makes my hands shake, so it is personally exciting to keep pieces in line and balance with hands that struggle to.

What is the best advice you have for other artists?

To those looking at being in the arts, the best pieces of advice I can lend are pursue what strikes your passion, find individuals that both inspire you and challenge your ideas, practice will make you better and bring you opportunities and don't rush your art, creativity or passion. You have more time than you know to learn references and be curious. If you put forth the effort and action, you will create things that inspire, create and transform.

Where can people find your work?

Jazz Fest grows in Green Bay

By Avery Wageman
Contributing Writer

Once a single-day event bringing together high school jazz bands from across the state, Green Bay Jazz Fest is blooming this spring.

For 53 years, UW-Green Bay has organized Jazz Fest as a celebration of jazz and as an opportunity for high school band students from across the state to perform together. This year's festival is expanding to a five-day event that includes performances from bands both local and from across the country.

Adam Gaines, Associate Professor at UW-Green Bay and Director of Jazz Fest, is excited for the potential impact of the festival on Green Bay's jazz community.

"The biggest thing is really to get a strong start here. We got a big grant from the city...which has really helped kick this thing off. We're really thankful for that," Gaines said. "This is kind of a first go at trying to make a brand-new festival here in town and get some real buzz started about it. I personally hope that people show up to the concerts and give it a try."

To kick off Jazz Fest, the swing-influenced, Chicago-based Alejandro Salazar Quartet will be performing at the Tarlton Theater at 6:30 p.m. on Wednesday, April 12.

The following day, a free community screening of "Young Man with a Horn" will be showing at the Brown County Central Library at 6:30 p.m. on April 13. The 1950 film is loosely based on the life of cornet player, Bix Beiderbecke, and stars Kirk

New art exhibit coming to Neville Public Museum

By Michael Callahan
Contributing Writer

The Neville Public Museum will be home to an exhibit of work from artists who have gone through Northeast Wisconsin Technical College's (NWTCC) Artisan and Business Center, demonstrating their skills and bringing the community together.

It opens on April 1 and closes on May 4, giving the community over a month to come by and visit.

Beth Kowalski, the museum's executive director, and Devyn McIlraith, the exhibition manager, are excited about the exhibit's opening, which will feature a variety of mediums and artists.

"There is a display of 2D and 3D artworks of varying skills and age ranges, but mostly adults," McIlraith said.

All of the artists featured in the upcoming exhibit have one thing in common — a connection to the the Artisan and Business Center.

"The criteria for the show is that you have to be an instructor or have taken a class through the artisan center to be able to submit your current work," Kowalski added.

Kowalski said participating in the exhibits is a good opportunity for artists to get fresh eyes on their work.

"The importance of this is the visibility," she said. "To be able to have their instructors and students' work from last semester have the opportunity and the surroundings to give it a visible space."

The annual exhibition, Kowalski said, is a joint effort between the artists of the Artisan and Business Center and the museum.

"They are the experts in teaching the coursework, we are the experts in how we display and make it accessible," she said.

That teamwork, McIlraith added, is a mutually beneficial arrangement.

"It is a community partnership for us and for them," she said.

Imagine Wanting Only This

by Kristen Radtke

By Kana Coonce
Contributing Writer

Imagine Wanting Only This is an autobiographical coming-of-age graphic memoir with themes that echo Sylvia Plath's The Bell Jar. Beginning with her childhood in Green Bay, this graphic novel follows Kristen Radtke through a young adulthood spent battling listlessness and the fears that plague so many of us, not only at that age, but throughout our lives: a fear of the passage of time, of the uncaring universe, of the inevitability of death. They're heavy topics that Radtke understandably struggles to juggle, but this only makes it hit harder when the pieces finally fall into place, not through Radtke's own accomplishments, but by the understanding and maturity that comes with time.

"I understood logically why we cannot live forever. But I couldn't comprehend why the dead couldn't be made undead. Why a heart that caved couldn't be filled out again." This passage, about the death of Radtke's uncle from a congenital heart defect, comes to define Radtke's battle with listlessness and discontent throughout her college years.

Like me — and many people of our generation — Radtke is also a compulsive Googler. I found myself learning more tangentially-related information throughout the course of this book than I thought possible for a memoir. Radtke covers topics like the often-overlooked Peshtigo fire of 1871, the deadliest fire in U.S. history; Sans-Soleil, a French "pseudo-travel" documentary told in letters that Radtke watched in college; the gene mutation that runs in her family, giving her and her family members an increased risk of heart failure; and the different locales she has visited across the globe in pursuit of "seeing everything" before she dies.

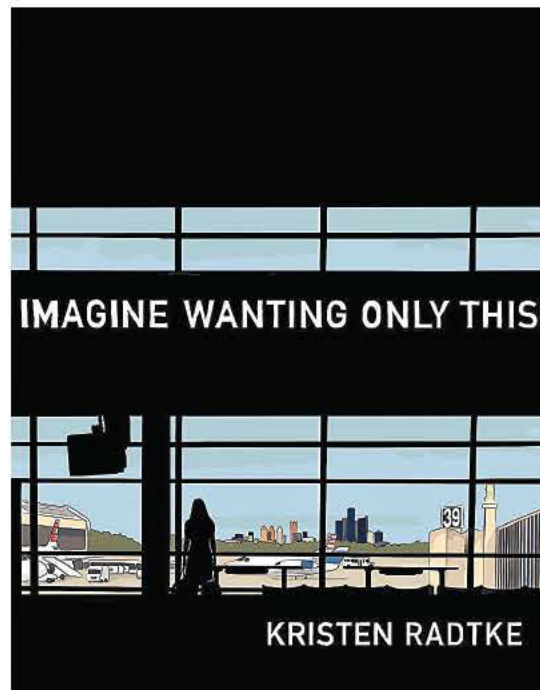

Radtke presents her life very matter-of-factly, neither shying away from the uglier truths of her life nor leaning too heavily into them. You begin to notice patterns across her excerpts, things that don't mean anything on their own or may have flown under the radar as they happened, but which begin to tell a story when considered alongside the other bits and pieces we learn about her life. One gets the sense that the writing of this memoir was as much a cathartic experience for Radtke as it becomes for the reader by the end. As with most early-adulthood revelations, the disjointed puzzle pieces of Radtke's anecdotes gradually click into place in a way that feels accidental.

Imagine Wanting Only This is not an easy read, nor is it necessarily a fun one. Radtke's art is stark, simultaneously life-like and cartoonish in a way that can only be achieved by rotoscoping. This lends to the memoir's feel as a journal of sorts, a struggling young woman's hope for connecting with the world at large, even if she's unsure of who will actually read it. The sentiment is so timely that this book serves as an unflinching time capsule, one that might be pored over by future generations the way Radtke pores over Wikipedia articles and her family's historical documents. In this sense, Radtke captures one of the many things that make us human: the desire to know and to be known. CP

Wisconsin Destination Imagination Affiliate Tournament comes to UW-Green Bay

By Janelle Fisher
City Pages Editor

There's no telling what you might see on campus at UW-Green Bay this Saturday, April 1, as teams from across the state gather to compete in the Wisconsin Destination Imagination Affiliate Tournament.

Starting as early as September, teams of up to seven students ranging in age from elementary to high school picked from a list of challenges released by Destination Imagination (DI) and began preparing for tournament season, when they will compete against other teams in their age group who chose the same challenge.

There are six challenges for teams to choose from — a technical, scientific, fine arts, improvisation, engineering and service learning challenge.

Each challenge comes with its own set of requirements, but the sky's the limit when it comes to how a team chooses to meet those requirements.

Affiliate Director Mary Bykowski said DI offers kids an opportunity to just be kids, which isn't always so easy in today's world.

"I think, to me, it would be so hard to be a kid in this day and age," she said. "When I was a kid, we played outside in our yard until it was dark outside in the summer or until someone said it's time to eat. And we didn't have electronic devices, which led us to have a much bigger imagination because we didn't have other stuff that does it for you... So to have kids being able to do whatever they want, for the most part, in this program and not having people think you're weird — because weird is a good thing here — it doesn't get better than that. They get a chance to be a kid again. They get a chance to imagine again."

One of the ways DI fosters imagination, Bykowski said, is by letting kids lead the way.

Longtime team members know the cardinal rule of DI is "if it doesn't say you can't, then you can" — meaning that teams can solve their challenges in any way they like as long as the final product meets the requirements of the challenge and is entirely team-created.

Team managers and parents are more like supervisors than a guiding force. They can teach skills and ensure things are done safely, but are not allowed to give the team any ideas about how to solve its challenge or do the work for the team.

"It's a totally kid-driven experience," Bykowski said. "They're not allowed to have outside interference — which is sometimes really hard for the team managers and their parents because they always want to put their hands in there... Kids need pride in what they do because it's 100% them and to have someone else help just breaks down that whole team composition."

That kid-driven nature is what Bykowski said sets DI apart.

"There are not many programs offered that do not have outside interference or outside assistance," she said. "I think that's what separates Destination Imagination from a lot of other things."

If a DI team wants to do something, the team members have to figure out how to do it themselves, which Bykowski said leads DI kids to learn skills that will help them later in life — even if they don't realize it at the time.

"We have kids that taught themselves computer coding because they wanted to make this thing do this, this and this, and they took that on themselves," she said. "They taught themselves to do those things or they looked for outside sources that could help them learn those things... If you're a 17-year-old kid and you learn to sew, guess what? That is something pretty huge because when you tear those jeans you're wearing, who's gonna sew them? They might think it's silly at the time, but going forward, they don't... As they get older and a little more mature, they look back going, 'you know what? That wasn't so bad after all. It was kind of smart.'"

Bykowski said learning those skills also helps build confidence in DI participants.

"The confidence that you get from being able to do these things on your own and with your peers is just a huge confidence level," she said. "It feels like, 'if I can do this...I can certainly do much better in other things.'"

Not everything a DI team sets out to do will pan out as they had hoped, but Bykowski said that is an opportunity to learn about how to cope with things not going according to plan.

"We always tell the kids that failure is not a bad thing," she said. "It teaches you not to just quit on something that doesn't work. It's about looking at 'okay, why didn't it particularly work? We've got to figure out why this didn't work if we want this particular thing in our challenge.' It really drives kids to research and dig deep into things and collaborate with other people in their thought process and learn to be team players."

Teamwork is an especially important part of DI.

At each level of competition, every team is presented with an instant challenge where teams are given a challenge on the spot and ▲ Creativity runs wild in DI as teams learn new methods and reimagine materials to come up with unique solutions to their chosen challenge.

► Teams at Saturday's competition will be competing not only for trophies and medals, but for the opportunity to compete at Global Finals at the end of May. Submitted photos scored not only on how well they complete the challenge in the given time and with the given materials, but also on how well they work together on a team, which Bykowski acknowledged is not always easy.

"Especially for younger kids, that can sometimes be a real challenge because they're all about me and 'my thoughts are the best and yours are okay, but we should do mine,'" Bykowski said. "And so sometimes for younger kids it's really hard to work as a team and learn as a team, but it's amazing the things I've seen over the course of 22 years about how [DI] changes children."

Bykowski shared a story from a former DI participant which demonstrates the lasting impact of skills learned and practiced in DI.

"One of our alumni that went into the service after high school, into the army, they were doing an exercise at the boot camp he was at that he ended up telling us about when we ran into him a couple years later," she said. "There was a river that ran at the end of the camp and they had an exercise where they gave us a bunch of materials and we had to build some sort of floating object that would get our team across the river in an amount of time. He said it was like instant challenge time all over again, just on a bigger scale. He said, 'my team and I rocked it.' Within a half hour they were across the river, and the other teams were just sort of staring at them, like 'what are they doing?' And he said, 'this is a DI thing.'"

The problem solving and critical thinking skills which DI cultivates in its participants, Bykowski said, sets them apart from their peers.

"In anything, whether in college or in your future employment, you can be miles ahead of everybody in the way you look at a work issue or even personality issues," she said. "Problem-based learning is a huge skill in your life because you're using that same direction of thinking towards most of what you look at in your life... You are like a future employer's dream when you come into their workforce."

As a volunteer-run organization, Bykowski said DI in Wisconsin exists because people have seen what it does for kids in setting them up for successful futures and alumni keep coming back to support that mission.

"This is a volunteer organization, and I can name so many people in it that have done [DI] for over 20 years," she said. "And they just still keep doing it in some way, shape or form because they believe strongly that kids really get a benefit out of it."

At the sectional tournaments occurring around the state throughout February and March and at the affiliate tournament this weekend, those experienced volunteers are joined by former DI participants who have graduated and returned to give back to the program.

continues on 10 ►

▲ Alumni can often be identified around DI tournaments by the red ties they wear.

▲ Even among teams competing in the same challenge, no two solutions are ever quite the same at a DI competition.

Those alumni, Bykowski said, are a valuable resource. "We want to utilize our alumni in the higher ranks of the organization because they know what it's like," she said. "They've been through it." Bykowski said the rate of retention DI has for participants-turned-volunteers is another thing that sets DI apart from other organizations. "There's things around here that people might have participated in, but do they go back and volunteer for them? Not a lot," she said. "But in this organization (DI), we depend on our alumni." At DI tournaments, alumni can often be recognized by the red ties many wear as a fun reminder of how they're tied to DI. Anyone curious about DI is encouraged to come check out the affiliate tournament, Bykowski said.

"If you're into DI and you want to come and see it or you're interested in maybe being on a team, [the state tournament] is something to come watch," she said. "You might not get it right away...so we'll have snippets of the challenges and people around helping and video monitors up with everything and anything you could want to know about DI." The culminating event of DI each season is Global Finals, where the top teams from around the world come together to compete in a multi-day celebration of creativity. Teams that qualify at the affiliate tournament will have the opportunity to advance to the global stage of competition, but Bykowski said she and the rest of the Wisconsin DI crew work hard to make the affiliate tournament just as special. "We want to model it and kind of make it our own version of Global Finals because we realize that not a lot of kids will get the chance to go to Global Finals," she said. "It's like the Olympics of DI. You can come and see the best of the best and you can come watch other teams from all over the state and see the solutions that they came up with... You're never going to see the same thing twice." CP
