Still time to see Bay Port's fall play

By Josephine Hinderman
Contributing Writer

This weekend, the Bay Port High School Theater program will be presenting its fall play, Fair Exchange — a play that follows the young, plain daughter of a beautiful mother after an artifact in their collection causes them to switch bodies.

Director and English Teacher Jaclyn Beattie explained, “The story takes place in the nineties and it is about a family who runs an antique dealership. Unfortunately, the father of the family has been missing for a year and this has put a strain on the mother and her daughters. The mother and her teenage daughter are as different as two people can be, so you can imagine the impact when a strange African artifact causes them to switch bodies! They decide to keep it a secret and try to figure out how to get things back to normal, but only a special tribal ceremony will save the day.”

More than 60 Bay Port High School students have been involved in the production of Fair Exchange.

“The best part of working on this play is by far working with the amazingly talented students,” Beattie said. “It is an incredible opportunity to be able to watch young adults take something on and create an experience that can be enjoyed by anyone.”

Being a part of the performing arts or being involved in a play gives students the opportunity to express themselves in a completely safe environment,” Beattie said. “I am always amazed at how we truly become a sort of family while working on the show and it is a place where students can develop their talent without fear of being judged or ridiculed. The support among cast and crew members is something that makes the long hours so worthwhile! Participating in the performing arts is such a nice way to escape from reality! A student who gets involved is able to create something completely unique which boosts self-confidence and self-assurance. And while doing this, a student can form solid friendships and bonds with others that enjoy the same thing.”

Beattie expressed an enthusiasm that people come out to support the play.

“Come on out and watch and support our students that’ve been involved in this production,” she said.

Tickets are still available to purchase, and can be purchased online at vancoevents.com/CALQ.

Beattie also suggests people be on the look-out for future Bay Port performances, exclaiming, “Keep an eye out for Bay Port High School’s Spring Musical... It’s going to be announced soon!”

Bay Port High School will be performing Fair Exchange Oct. 26, 27 and 28 at 7 p.m. at the Bay Port Performing Arts Center (PAC).

Picky Eating Tips & Tricks

Here are some tips to help your picky eater!

1. Make meal time positive and offer your child choices to make them excited to eat!

Engage in pleasant conversation at the table, give your child a choice of the fruits/vegetables/meats/recipes to try at each meal, and allow your child to watch you having fun and enjoying your food!

2. Eating doesn't just involve the mouth! Play and explore the food with all of your senses.

Touch the food, kiss the food, lick the food, bite the food, and be silly with food during meal times. You can also use raw fruits and veggies like a paint brush to paint a picture, push cars through pudding, crush and squish food with fisher price animals, etc.

3. Involve your child in the kitchen.

Have your child help you pick out and gather ingredients, cut, mix, measure, and pour ingredients into a dish, and taste test the recipe along the way while it's being made. Having your child involved in the kitchen allows them to see the individual ingredients used in the meal and gives an opportunity to explore them without demands of eating!

4. Make eating fun with a game board plate!

You can use a winner dinner plate during meals to alternate preferred foods with novel or unpreferred foods to make eating fun!

5. Don't stress!

If your child doesn't want to engage with a new food on the first time it's offered, that's okay! Don't have high expectations for your child to eat the food on the first try (or first few tries)! Allow your child to explore the new food without too much pressure to eat it as that can contribute to a negative experience and make it less likely for them to explore the food later. Continue to offer the food during meals as it may take a few introductions before they're ready to eat it.

Teaching Press celebrates launch of all-around ambitious book

By Janelle Fisher
City Pages Editor

Teaching Press students and supporters gathered last Wednesday, Oct. 18, to celebrate the launch of the latest book put out by UW-Green Bay's Teaching Press — a book documenting the Lower Fox River PCB cleanup efforts.

The book, authored by Captain Greg Neuschafer, retired U.S. Navy Oceanographer and UW-Green Bay Distinguished Alumni, includes a timeline and highlights of one of the nation's most ambitious environmental stability projects to date with QR codes spread throughout linking to an extensive digital collection of supporting documentation compiled by Neuschafer and housed at UW-Green Bay's Cofrin Library.

The book, Neuschafer said, is meant to be a tool to help others understand the significance of this environmental project happening in their own backyards.

"This book is a research tool," he said. "It's a wrench. It's to get you into a database that we've put together. So it's not for reading for excitement or for pleasure. I want to invite you to, from your own perspective, dig into this library and see what you can learn."

▲ Copies of Lower Fox River PCB Cleanup Timeline are available for purchase online at uwgb.edu/teaching-press/projects. Janelle Fisher photos

While the collection and organization of the content which makes up the book and digital library was an ambitious undertaking for Neuschafer, Professor Rebecca Meacham said the physical construction of the book proved to be quite an ambitious undertaking for her students as well as they navigated the book's many fold-out pages.

"What the students started to figure out was that we could have an entire book ▲ Teaching Press students demonstrate the folding process that had to be done for each copy to ensure the pages would fold out properly after the book was bound.

filled with what we call 'foldy-outty' pages — it's the technical term," Meacham said. "The fold-out pages have QR codes on them and when you use your phone to scan the QR code, it goes to a resource in the Cofrin Library digital collection that Greg has put together."

The folded pages, though, meant that the book could not be sent out for production, and after some trial and error, Meacham said the Teaching Press students discovered that the best way to produce copies of the book was to hand-fold each page.

"They had it worked out to partnerships — one folded in and the other folded the other side in," Meacham said. "And the fold the way they do so [the book] can be bound."

Because if you fold in too far, you bind your book and then can't open the pages. It's an interesting little puzzle."

At the time of the launch, an impressive 104 copies had been made and were ready to be distributed to attendees of the launch party and those who wish to purchase the book.

More information about Teaching Press and where to buy this book and others can be found at uwgb.edu/teaching-press/projects.

N.E.W. Woodworkers Guild celebrates 40th annual show

By Janelle Fisher
City Pages Editor

For the past four decades, the Northeastern Wisconsin Woodworkers Guild has built up a community of local woodworkers, offering education, fellowship, resources and a love of the craft.

Now with more than 100 members, woodworkers find their way to the Guild in a variety of ways.

For some members of the Guild, like Randall Hendrick and Jim Michiels, it was current members that got them interested in joining.

"I retired 15 years ago and I got into woodworking a year after I retired," Hendricks said. "A few years after that, one of the guys I used to work with belonged to the Guild and he asked me to come a couple times and I enjoyed what I saw. It was great to talk to other people who had similar ideas and interests that I had."

"I was asked to come to a meeting and that was the end of it," Guild member Stan Fisher said. "I joined and I like watching what everyone else does and how they do it. I've picked up a lot of ideas."

"For me, it was being exposed to other disciplines in woodworking," Guild member Gerald Jensen said. "I said, 'I've been doing some wood turning, but I want

▲ An assortment of projects by Pete Schuh, including intricately wood-burned plates.
▼ Stan Fisher stands with three of the boats he has made — an Adirondack guideboat, canvas canoe, and cedar strip canoe. Janelle Fisher photos to know about other stuff. I've gotten some insight into cabinet building, furniture building, canoe building, all kinds of other disciplines that relate to woodworking that are just other areas of interest. I may not ever do those things, but I'd like to know more about them and the Guild provides that."

It's not only the exposure to new ideas or techniques that attract members to the Guild though, as the group also offers resources to aid in projects members might already be working on.

"I retired, bought a wood lathe and struggled for a while," Guild member Pete Schuh said. "The guy at the woodworkers depot said, 'Well, the Woodworkers Guild has a library where you can watch videos on woodturning and things like that.' So I joined the Guild."

The Guild is open to woodworkers with all levels of experience ranging from amateurs just starting out to professionals.

"I didn't do any woodworking at all, until I started thinking about retiring," Jensen said. "And then it dawned on me that I probably ought to have something to do after I've retired. I was about 58 or so when I took my first woodworking class and shortly after that I got introduced to the lathe and I've been woodturning ever since."

For other members, woodworking was something they had dabbled in previously, but picked up seriously more recently.

"I made a cradle and play boxes and stuff like that, but with my work I never got into it," Hendricks said. "I always knew I was going to have some kind of a shop so I had built that prior to my retirement, and once I got into it, about a year after [retirement], that's when I bought all my equipment and I just went from there."

Some members recall their fondness for woodworking beginning all the way back in middle school.

"It was eighth grade industrial arts," Michiels said. "Then I got busy raising a family and when I retired, I built the shop and got back into woodworking and weaving baskets."

"Freshman year of high school started it all," Fisher said. "We used every machine that they had there... I built my first canoe before that — I think I was in seventh grade and I made it out of plywood and some other stuff and yeah, it was pretty tippy, but we used it. I really got into woodworking when I had grandchildren and could make them things — rocking chairs, rocking horses, cradles, everything."

Members of the NEW Woodworkers Guild craft a vast assortment of things out of wood, from baskets to bowls to toys to ornaments to projects as big as bookshelves and even boats.

Each year, members have the opportunity to display their work at the Guild's annual Artistry in Wood Show and Sale, scheduled to be held this year on Nov. 11 and 12 at Denmark High School.

While the purpose of the show is to give Guild members an opportunity to share their work with the community, and maybe even sell something, there is value in just getting to talk to people about their work and getting to see what others have been making.

"It's the interaction with the people that attend the show," Jensen said. "It's always fun to talk to them and find out what their interests are."

Hendricks echoed that sentiment, noting, "That's the best part of the show — just talking with people."

"You can spend five hours talking and you might not sell much, but you're spending five hours talking about how it's done and why you tried it and all of that," Schuh said. "That's the fun part."

"My favorite part is looking at what everybody else makes," Michiels said. "Everybody has different talents and different skills. It's amazing, the talent and skill and what you can do with a piece of wood."

"The talents that some people have, there's no way even in another life I could do some of those things," Fisher said. "But talking to the people, that's my favorite thing."

To people who are interested in getting into woodworking, Jensen said the best advice he had would be to start early.

"What would have been really helpful to me is if I would have been allowed to take shop classes or something when I was in high school," Jensen said. "One of the really sad things now is the number of schools that have discontinued any shop or industrial arts programs. We need to get back with that because we need people that can work with their hands and develop the disciplines that are necessary to woodworking."

"It just takes so long to fine tune your skills," Hendricks said. "I think people should start woodworking as early as possible."

▲ An assortment of wood lathe and laser-engraved projects by Gerald Jensen.

Michiels said that surrounding yourself with others who are involved in woodworking, such as by joining the Woodworkers Guild, can also be incredibly helpful for new woodworkers to get started.

"It's hard to learn on your own," Michiels said. "You can read, you can watch videos, but surround yourself with good people and experienced people. The advice they give you is worth tons of time."

And the best way to get inspired to start? Try attending one of the Woodworkers Guild's shows.

"Just go to a show," Schuh said. "Look and see what you like — as you walk by, you might see carvings, you might see scroll sawing, you might see a wood lathe. Wait for something to catch your eye and say 'Geeze, I'd like to do that.' Start there, and you can always expand as you go out, but you've got to have an interest in something to start."

Once a project has piqued your interest, the last hurdle is actually getting started.

"I've got a doctor friend and he's just amazed at the boats I build," Fisher said. "He's never built anything out of wood in his life and he'd like to start... but he's afraid to start... That's most people's problem — they're afraid to do it or that they might make a mistake, but that's how you learn."

Joining the Woodworkers Guild helps connect woodworkers to others who have had similar experiences — easing that fear of starting by providing a wealth of resources for starting a new project or troubleshooting when mistakes happen.

Being surrounded by other woodworkers, members get an opportunity to learn lots of different ways to approach the same project.

"I like being in the Guild because I see what somebody makes and I can picture in my mind just how I would go about doing it," Fisher said.

"If we all made the same thing, there would be six different ways of making it," Schuh said. "You put your own little touch to it and you learn from everybody that you talk to."

Not only do Guild members build experience, but they build connections with each other.

"I've developed relationships with other woodworkers," Jensen said. "Periodically we get together in each other's shops and talk about things and projects we're working on and kind of feed off [each other] a little bit and it's a good way to learn."

"I like to talk to people and ask them questions," Hendricks said. "I got three quarters of what I do and different items [I make] because people showed me how to do it, whether that's a cutting board or a bandsaw box... That's all from Guild members who I talked to and who are doing similar things."

If you're picking up a new project, there's bound to be a bit of learning involved and maybe even some mistakes, but being in the Guild means members have the opportunity to minimize those mistakes by learning from each other.

"I think everybody that does woodworking makes mistakes," Michiels said. "The thing about the Guild is you can listen to people and listen to their stories... You listen to people, you talk to people, you learn and you limit your mistakes. You still make them, but you learn how to recover from them and make less."

Secret Wisconsin: A Guide to the Weird, Wonderful, and Obscure

By Tom Manus and Kristi Flick Manus

By Kris Leonhardt
Editor-in-chief

For an avid reader, history enthusiast and traveler, Secret Wisconsin: A Guide to the Weird, Wonderful, and Obscure is an eye-opening read on some of Wisconsin's mystiques.

Husband and wife authors, Tom Manus and Kristi Flick Manus, are freelance travel writers for print and online publications who enjoy back road trips.

The book should be titled “Hidden in plain sight.”

The couple's ventures have dug up some hidden Wisconsin gems that you are not likely to find anywhere else.

One story involves a piece of the five-ton Soviet satellite, Sputnik IV, which fell from the sky during reentry on Sept. 5, 1962, and left its permanent mark in the city of Manitowoc.

While the Sputnik accident may be a matter of common knowledge, the mark that it left on a city street for future generations is an inconspicuous marker that might be overlooked by the unaware eye.

While the 20-pound piece was returned to Russia, a life-size replica is housed in a Manitowoc museum, while the crash site is noted in a more visible place.

A metal ring marks that location, embedded in the pavement, in the center of Manitowoc's Eighth Street, just north of its Park Street intersection.

Farther south, a Grafton chair company made its mark in Wisconsin history due to a 1920s marketing plan.

The Wisconsin Chair Company was manufacturing chairs and phonograph (record) cabinets and while the chairs were selling well, the cabinets were another story.

To increase sales, the company decided to include records with their phonograph cabinets.

“Soon, Paramount started recording 78 rpm records in a chair factory in Grafton,” the book notes.

“Paramount started producing blues recordings (called ‘race records’ at the time) in 1929. They contracted with furniture store owners around the South who acted as talent scouts and arranged for the musicians to travel north to the Grafton studio and record. Trains arrived from all over the South with artists aboard who would become legendary. Louis Armstrong, Ma Rainey, Charley Patton and Skip James are just a few. A small all-white, polka-loving factory town became pivotal in an influential musical genre, and Paramount Records grew into the country's most crucial producer of blues records.”

When the Great Depression hit, Paramount stopped recording and a few years later, the chair company closed down.

Today, a monument stands in Grafton to commemorate the Paramount recording studio, though the factory has long been demolished.

The book features a little less than 100 tales of the obscure, but often significant, history that is unique to our state.
